

Summarized Customer Notes from the Final Customer Check-In

The following insights were obtained during our fourth and final customer check-in with Julius Brown, the Executive Director of OSI-CAN Saskatchewan; Brooklyn Coulson, the Digital Impact Officer of the Saskatchewan Community Foundation; Dr. Tim Maciag, the professor of our ENSE 271 class, and our classmates from our ENSE 271 class. The notes include their opinions and feedback on our final WordPress design, as well as the questions they had for us and our responses to those questions.

- Julius Brown stated that he “loved the use of colours” on the final WordPress design and that he liked the blue and white colour scheme. He also said that the colours were “nice on the eyes” and that blue was a good choice since it is less triggering for OSI-CAN's target demographic.
- Mr. Brown also stated that he liked the search function on the resources page. He liked how, when you type a search, it provides a brief bit of description of each result.
- He mentioned that the volunteer page on the original OSI-CAN Saskatchewan website serves two purposes. The first one is to find people who have experience with work related PTSD and/or occupational stress and to get their help with leading support groups. The second is to find volunteers for OSI-CAN's various other events and programs.
- Mr. Brown liked that we displayed that OSI-CAN stands for Operational/occupational Stress Injury Canada. This is visible at the top of the home page.
- He liked that we used other images that were not on the original website.
- We were asked if these other images were free to use. We responded that they are and that some of them are AI generated.
- Mr. Brown gave a warning on using AI to generate images of first-responders, military, and public safety personnel. He mentioned that it may not be good for the users of the site if the displayed uniforms are not authentically Canadian.
- A classmate asked us about how our site does not have a contact page and instead has the phone numbers displayed on the home page.
- Another classmate told us that our design is “really something new” and that it is “very different from the [original website]. They asked us about how our group came together to create this WordPress design.
- Mr. Maciag appreciated that, when we were told that our original main colour of red could be triggering for the users of the OSI-CAN site, we “took that too heart”, “ran with it the whole semester”, and changed the colour scheme of our entire design.
- Ms. Coulson told us that our design looks like a professional site and not like a charity site.
- Ms. Coulson also asked us if we had any other websites that we took design inspiration from. Our response was that there were no main sites that we looked at for inspiration. We mostly used web design images and examples from the internet and Pinterest, as well as our own experiences and knowledge.

- We were told that the blue provides a welcoming feeling and resembles a “nice bright blue sky, that our site was “very well done” and the “resources page is awesome”.
